"Safety Gear - It's about getting the right fit and being safe on the job"

Women in construction need the right safety gear to be safe on the job.

When McConnell Dowell engineer Kimberly Jupp (pictured left) couldn't find a work shirt in her size because work wear has traditionally been sized for men, she set about solving the problem. What she found was that manufacturers would only explore adding a women's range if they could secure an order for 1000 units. "This has always been a problem for women in construction," says Kimberly. "But with more and more women training as engineers, truck drivers, quantity surveyors, traffic managers and machinery operators things are about to change. Having more personal protective equipment items and work gear options for women sends a message that construction companies welcome women and want to keep everyone safe". It's about safety and comfort.
